ECB: Time to Change the Story?

A Publication of BMO Capital Markets Economic Research • Douglas Porter, CFA, Chief Economist, BMO Financial Group

The ECB's dovish stance is really looking out of place these days, particularly with Euro Area inflation unexpectedly picking up speed and hitting a recordhigh 5% in December. Not only is the central bank refusing to even entertain the idea of higher rates, it is still buying bonds after the PEPP ends in March. (Italy, which has enjoyed a rare year of calm, may need some support as it is about to get a little more volatile if Mario Draghi walks away from the PM role.) Everywhere else in the world, inflation is on the up and up, boosted by supply shortages and strong consumer demand, and the Euro Area is no different. The ECB expects inflation to remain above its 2% target again this year, but it needs to drop meaningfully to reach its 3.2% forecast, up from 2.6% in 2021. Chief Economist Philip Lane (one of the doves) quickly spoke to the media following December's brow-raising inflation figure, and repeated the well-known narrative: that it expects inflation will come down this year. But, "it's going to be above where we want it to be in the long term". He also urged markets not to compare the 2020-to-2022 period to the past. While that makes sense, it is becoming more and more difficult to ignore such price pressures. Higher prices will eat into household savings which have been supporting economic growth.

At a minimum, the tone needs to change (even just acknowledging greater upside inflation risks) or the ECB will have another problem on its hands: defending its credibility.
